PuTTY allows a client computer to run two programs at the same time, by using so-called “sessions”. In this way, the user can connect to different services through one session. By default, PuTTY will create a new session each time you launch it, so you can connect to a remote site or download files through one session and upload files through a different session. PuTTY uses so-called “putty.exe” files to handle PuTTY communication with other computers. Each PuTTY process is configured so that it loads a different putty.exe file, which contains all the information needed to connect to the remote site or to transfer files. PuTTY manages this process automatically, without requiring any actions from the user. By default, PuTTY connects to remote computers in order to establish a new connection. It is possible, however, to set the PuTTY connection to “remain open” and to keep the connection established after you close PuTTY. If a connection is kept open, the PuTTY connection manager will reopen the connection if the Internet connection is lost or restored. In this way, you can use PuTTY to access remote computers when the local Internet connection is down, as long as the PuTTY connection is set to remain open. PuTTY for Windows includes a very basic configuration tool for Telnet connections. If you want to use SSH for your connections, you will need to install the PuTTY configuration tool for SSH, or use the command line interface.
