Field of the Invention The invention pertains to the field of aircraft self-initiated munitions, and more particularly, to the field of acoustic/gauge fired munitions and guidance systems employing acoustic pulses and/or emissions in conjunction with seekers and/or radio frequency (RF) and/or infra-red (IR) pulse and/or emission telemetry and/or guidance and sensing devices. Description of the Related Art Many conventional aircraft munitions include an electrical storage battery capable of providing a relatively large amount of energy for initiating one or more explosive devices. These munitions typically include one or more initiators which are associated with the stored electrical energy of the battery and which are selected to initiate one or more explosive devices upon the occurrence of an event that is indicative of the release of the stored energy. For example, one type of conventional aircraft munitions includes one or more initiators which are responsive to a signal from a radar or other source indicative of the occurrence of a particular event which is indicative of the release of stored electrical energy. Other munitions utilize a pyrotechnic or electrical device to initiate one or more explosive devices upon the occurrence of an event indicative of the release of stored electrical energy. Still other munitions incorporate one or more acoustic or acoustic/gauge devices responsive to the initiation of a detonating signal into a delay bar or other delay device by electrical or magnetic means. Such munitions include an acoustic device and/or a delay bar or other delay device which is programmed to initiate a detonating signal into the same after a programmed delay, typically, after the initiation of the detonating signal into the delay bar. Such munitions have generally been found to be satisfactory for the intended purpose of military and law enforcement personnel. However, such munitions are relatively expensive, require a relatively large amount of electrical storage energy, and tend to utilize several devices or systems, including, for example, the initiator, the acoustic device and the delay bar, and the electrical or magnetic initiating system. The present invention is directed toward the elimination or minimization of the one or more drawbacks of the conventional aircraft munitions described above.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a rotary actuator that rotates a first member by using a first rotary drive source and a second member by using a second rotary drive source. 2.
