Food storage systems are known that reduce or eliminate waste of food by providing a barrier between the food and the atmosphere. This prevents the food from spoiling by air contact and moisture exchange with the atmosphere. Such systems can be convenient for storing food in an effort to maximize availability while minimizing the waste of perishables. In some cases the food products are stored in an effort to simply preserve food through storage rather than the more common effort to improve the flavor or other characteristics of food. Preserving food products (particularly dry food products) can be accomplished through many techniques, including wrapping the food in parchment or wax paper, paper sacks, cardboard packaging, or vacuum packaging, all of which offer some protection from exposure to air and moisture. Some of the various food-preservation techniques used include canning, baking, freezing, refrigerating, and dehydrating. There are various methods to preserve food products with vacuum packaging. However, the prior art vacuum packaging methods and systems include a number of drawbacks. For example, some vacuum systems and methods require the use of vacuum-in-place systems, and take a long time to set up. Other vacuum methods require large or cumbersome systems to generate the pressure needed to remove the air from a container. Accordingly, there remains a need in the art for vacuum systems for food storage systems that are compact and provide a quick and efficient way to create a vacuum in a container that is safe for food storage.

Characteristics of malignant lymphomas involving the peripheral nervous system. A series of primary malignant lymphomas (MLs) involving the peripheral nervous system (PNS) is presented. Between January of 1982 and November of 1992, 90 patients with MLs involving the PNS were seen at the Department of Pathology, Osaka City University Graduate School of Medicine. Thirty-four of these were not amenable to surgical treatment. They were treated with low-dose chemotherapy, and the post-treatment survival periods ranged from 1.5 to 158.4 months (median, 58.4 months). Among those 34 patients, 22 had low-grade lymphomas (LGLs) and 12 had high-grade lymphomas (HGLs). The median survival periods for these two subgroups were 50.0 and 34.0 months, respectively (log-rank test, $p = 0.1213$). Twelve patients had both primary and secondary involvement of the PNS. The median survival periods for these patients with either low-grade or high-grade MLs were 50.0
