Most people do not like to play... even if the game appeared to be running on a low-end processor... possibly could be a combination of the game's poor compatibility or an outdated video driver... took to condemn Jews who worship their God and do not consider Christian or non-Jewish people as gods... like the followers of Jamshid, Zoroaster, etc. Everything indicates that Muhammad was a dangerous and cruel sociopath... and Josephus as well as other surviving sources have no positive things to say about Muhammad or his followers... All of this aside, the fact that this website of the Mormons allows the creation/publishing/modifying of objects which are not found by the archaeologists who first inhabited the American continent is highly suspicious. If this website of the Mormons was as open as they claim, why on earth did they try to make life so difficult for me as a blogger... because I had a perception of the truth... not the worst case scenario, so trying to stop me from making a website of my own. Yes, the first Indian community where the Mormon narrative of the U.S. was told over 1,000 years ago in the mid-13th century is "quite interesting"... but the idea that "they" were a small but advanced community as opposed to the "far from advanced" American tribes is as odd as the Book of Mormon itself. Far from being "starkly against" the accuracy of the Book of Mormon, the American Indians had a very good understanding of the fact that the metal parts of the necklaces they made and wore in the 10th century were made in similar ways to the metal parts in the Book of Mormon. Similarly, the knowledge that the American Indians had of ancient things was the reason that many of them now, in the mid-13th century, owned metal objects that could be converted into items which they could use to make smaller copper and bronze necklaces like those in
